This part of the DMZ closest to Seoul had the feel of a Cold-War theme park -- complete with a fake village on the North Korean side built to impress the South. And in case you missed the point, loudspeakers blared propaganda -- marshal songs praising Kim Jong-un. A few miles away, tourists crowded an observation deck, snapping photos with troops, cardboard cut-outs --- and the real ones. What the visitors could not see on the other side of those mountains are 10,000 artillery pieces the North Korean military has aimed at Seoul. All of which could reach the 28 million people in and around the South Korean capital. U.S war planners estimate 500,000 people could be killed in a second Korean War.

“Is there any other metropolitan area on earth this vulnerable?” Certainly nothing that approaches Seoul in terms of the size, the density of the population. There’s nothing like it. U.S. Air Force General James Slife flew with us over the city. It’s just 30 miles from the DMZ. We landed at Osan Air Base where Korean airmen and their American colleagues monitor all activity north of the DMZ. For security, they shut off the giant video displays right before we came in. This facility is among the first to detect North Korean missile launches.

You’re, like, on a war footing all the time. That’s right. This is truly one of those places where the best way to prevent a war is being ready for a war. The North’s latest missile test used a new type of solid fuel engine and was fired from a mobile launcher, making it quick to deploy and difficult for U.S. satellites to detect in real-time.

“With the development of ballistic missiles, with the development of nuclear weapons, things here have a tension that you can feel in the air as you move around places like this.” We wanted to talk to the general who leads U.S. forces in Korea and would command Korean troops in the event of a war. He asked to meet us at Guard Post Four. It’s a citadel on critical high ground at the end of a road lined with land mines. We were the first American news crew allowed in. This was no Cold-War theme park. Body armor was required and artillery was on standby in the event we came under fire. General Vincent Brooks has commanded U.S. forces fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan.

“I don’t think people at home know how tense this line is. What it takes to go from the condition we’re in at this moment to hostilities again is literally the matter of a decision on North Korea’s side to say fire. And on top of this we have the missile capability that’s been developed, over 120 missiles fired just in the time of Kim Jong-un alone.” So now they’re talking about ICBMs that might be able to reach the West Coast of the United States. How do you stop them from taking that next step? North Korea’s responsible for the direction that the region is going. It is responsible for the conditions of instability that are starting to arise. It has to take responsibility for that and stop. His country is poor. His people are starving. What is it that he wants? Survival—recognition. Survival.

Kim Jung-un is now recognized as a global threat. U.S. intelligence estimates he has at least 10 nuclear weapons. If the U.S. decided it had no choice but to launch a pre-emptive strike on an ICBM test site, it could trigger the unthinkable. “If North Korea uses nuclear weapons, it will be met with an effective and overwhelming response. Now they can take it to the bank. We make that same point to our allies and partners, like the Republic of Korea and like Japan. Effective and overwhelming response? Effective and overwhelming response. Wipe North Korea off the map? Whatever overwhelms ya.

That warning rang in our ears as we returned to Seoul and met one last time with defector Thae Yong-ho. We asked about his brother and sister, still in North Korea. “What do you think has happened to them? They will be sent to prison camps. That is what I am absolutely sure. Does that weigh on you? Of course. Yes. I cannot get rid of that kind of nightmare after night of seeing my brother and sister in prison camps. Thae told us he believes he can help topple the North Korean regime by encouraging other defections and speaking out. “Is there any other metropolitan area on earth this vulnerable?”

Certainly nothing that approaches Seoul in terms of the size, the density of the population. There’s nothing like it.

U.S. Air Force General James Slife flew with us over the city. It’s just 30 miles from the DMZ.
